SMITHY SONG.

When I am half a-dronuing And only half solvey.
When daylight's grayest gleaning
Virus turwage the bileds to seep.
On then I hear the dinging
Of the smithy hummers ringing.
Ching ching ching, ching,
Ching ching, ching, ching.

At ere when I'm returning
From inhers of the day.
Their forges jet are burning,
And still their hammers play;
And off the amiths are singing
To that measured, merry ringin
Ching, ching, ching, ching,
Ching, ching, ching, ching,

Often with rhythmic bending
Of bodies to and fru.
Casy toil in couples conding
The spacin out, there en biow;
One beammer always awinging
the while the other's ringing.
Ching ching, ching ching
thing ching, ching ching.

O morry anvils according
All day till set of sun!
It is by steady pounding
That noticest tasks are demaily sturdy blows and swinging
That keep the world a ringing.
Ching ching ching ching.
Ching ching ching ching.

TWO MOUNTAIN LIONS.

Their Magnificent Courage When Brought to Bay.

They Pight to the Beath with a Pack of thouse, Eucked by Armed Ranters, and Bravely Most Their Doom.

There had been great excitement mong the ranchmen of the valley of the Sierra Madre for some weeks over the depredations committed upon their flocks of sheep and herds of cattle by flocks of sheep and herds of cattle by some beast of prey. What this robber was no one could say with any exactness, for, uniting an extraordinary degree of cunning with great speed of foot, the rogue invariably managed to clude all pursuit. Morning after morning some herder would report a cow, call or sheep done to death with a eruel wound in its throat from which the assassin had drained its warm life's blood. But the dead carcass was all that remained to tell the story of the coming and going of the spoiler, for no shadow left less trace of its

This enemy of their herds was all the more feared by the cattlemen, as there was no guessing where the next victim was to be found, for with incredible rapidity of movement the animiles in every direction, seeking with all the fastidiousness of a true epicure the tenderest lambs and choicest brand of cattle. The herds themselves seemed to know that some foe lurked sear, and at night would huddle together as if for mutual protection.

At last matters reached a climax when the fine imported Durham cow, "with a long pedigree," of one of the wealthy stock-owners of the vicinity strayed away from her comfortable stall, and, with the curlosity of her icx, was investigating the country, when she was set upon by the mysterious beast of prey. She was found literally torn to pieces, and it was evifent that the cow, a young one, had enleavored to make some fight for her life, for her horns were stained with blood, and a trail of blood leading to a small thicket close at hand indicated that the animal that had killed her had not escaped without a wound.

It had been believed from the first that the depredator had made its de-scent from the mountains, to which it would return after each orgy, and, on bloodhounds being sent for and placed on the trail, the dogs led at once toward the rugged peaks that frown down on this fair valley. The blood-stains ceased with the thicket, so it was concluded that the animal had not been very severely wounded, and no further traces of its passage were visible in the open country, though the dogs showed no hesitation on the trail. The hunting party numbered nearly a dozen and was composed of local Nim-rods, who scented fine sport on the ocension, and stockmen, each of whom had the loss of one or more fine blooded sheep or cows to avenge.

After some ten or twelve miles of steady travel, facing the chill mounthe wiry little Mexican ponies into a brisk trot, the party reached the little station of Rio Namiquipa, where the dogs paused. Here they seemed puzzled at some sudden turn the trail had taken, for they ran here and there for some minutes, finally breaking away up the river. But after a run of a hundred feet or so the old Chihuahua bound Mignel made a stand, and then, with a warning cry to his mates, turned and sped back to where the hunters waited. The nack followed him, though with some heritation, until, pressing him close as he went leaping from one to the other of the stepping stones that crossed the stream, they seemed all at once to understand his maneuvers and leaped forward up the shelving bank with a joyful cry of certainty. Old Miguel's master, as sged Mexican, by name Leansier, explained that the dogs had here struck the trail of some other animal that had come down the river to drink at that spot. He had, he thought, joined the one they sought, and the two had struck out together for the mountains. With renewed inscross the shallow stream and followed the dogs, which were now only dark specks on the golden sands that washed the foot of the grim and mighty

The dogs were observed after awhile to gather about a clump of eactus monutains proper, then to go on and finally disappear behind a mass of fallen bowiders. At this the party failen bowiders. At this the party urged on their ponies, as it was evident that the game was near at hand. Old Leander at the clump of eatens dismounted, and after a brief examination of the disturbed sand declared at this place the wounded animal had lain down to rest, while the other, probably its mate, had stood by. As the bunters paused here the loud barking of the dogs was heard at some little distance, so clapping spurs to the ponies the party west forward at a galiop.

The hounds were found to have gathered about a small heap of earth and stones, on which stood as snowmous mountain lion defping them with blazing eyes and waving tuited all. He was a magnificent male, with away skin marked with cering as full of pride as any menurch of Arabian desert, and arear that woke the echoes in the mountain gorges far above his defiant head. The yellow smoothness of his side was broken by a jazged wound outlined in dark clot-ted blood, but his courage was undaunted by the yelping pack of dogs that surrounded him, making false starts at him, yet afraid to attack him.

Of his mate nothing was to be seen. The hunters, each anxious to claim the lion as his trophy, pressed forward and, siming over the surging mass of hounds fired upon the majestic crea-ture facing death so resolutely. Wounded in half a dozen places, the ion sprung into the air with a scream of agony and rage, then fell, to be instantly covered by the dogs, barking in triumph over a defeated foe. But they had flattered themselves too soon that the prey was theirs, for with a desperate courage the lion struck out right and left, sending his enemies heels over head with blows of his pow-erful paws and ripping and tearing with his unsheathed claws and giant molars. Their red blood mingled with his own and dyed the sand crimson, and they gave back for an instant, until, seeing that the mountain king was dying even as he fought, they re-armed to the battle. But as they fell upon him a roar from the frowning heights of the mountains preclaimed that another for was at hand. The mate was returning and had scented the battle from afar. In another moment she leaped into view, pausing on the pinnacle of a tall spire of rock and surveying the scene below with an angry cant of her sleek, cat-like head. Outlined against the tender blue of the morning sky she seemed a yellow carving of yellow marble, but only for a brief moment, for as her topas eyes caught sight of her dead mate and the frantic dogs, she aprung down to jthe crag next beneath her, just as a volley of shots shattered the extreme end of the one she had that instant left. She descended with magnificent bounds that sent her lithe body from peak to peak with incredible rapidity, paying not the slightest apparent attention to the dogs or the hunters and seeming only to see the fallen monarch below. the tender blue of the morning sky she only to see the fallen monarch below. She reached the little gorge where he lay. A second volley had failed to stay her as she came bounding down, but now a third greeted her as she sprung from the last spur of rock, and a gush of crimson blood marked where some bullet had found a home in her quivering flank. Then for the first time she seemed to notice her human foes, and leaping to the side of her dead mate faced them with a rear of defiance, even as she bent her head and licked the bloody carcass at her feet. The dogs, taking this for a sign of timidity, flew at her feroclously, but the lioness, rendered furious and reckless by her mate's death, met this attack with a savage determination that sent sover al away yelping. wounded severely, and stretched others dead, while all hesi-tated to continue the fight.

Turning once more to her dead comon his stiffened form and then faced the mountain, and would have sprung away had not the hunters, who had wound the dogs instead, here succeeded in breaking one of her shoulders by a single shot out of a score. She fell ferward with a cry and rolled over on the yellow sands that drank her blood. Once more the dogs attacked her, and though she fought like a fury with tooth and sail they mastered her.

Again and again she endeavored to right herself, only to fall forward on the broken bone, while her determined foes tore at her limbs and sought her slender throat. The hunters endeav-ored to call off the frantic hounds, but they could not be induced to leave their prey, to which they clung until the beautiful wild creature lay dead and mangled beside her mate.—Galena (Mex.) Cor. of Philadelphia Times.

The Aroma of Wine. At a recent meeting of the Paris Academy of Sciences M. Rommier read a paper on the yeast of wine-the bouquet, or aroma, of the wine made from grapes of the same species but grown in different districts being quite distinct. The characteristic bouquet seems to be due to the district, and wine from shifted vines or cuttings does not necessarily possess the special flavor of the original when planted in other districts. It is well known that the best wines are produced from grapes raised on volcanie
